Geology of the Smith Property, Smith Conservation Restriction 2008

The bedrock of the Smith Conservation Area consists of Precambrian Dry Hill Gneiss and Poplar Mountain Gneiss. These metamorphic rocks generally strike north-south and dip to the west on the property. They are part of the Pelham Dome, a doubly-plunging anticline that extends approximately 45 km north-south from Northfield to Belchertown. The Pelham Dome consists of uplifted Precambrian metamorphic rocks blanketed on its margins by younger sedimentary rocks. The Pelham Dome is one of several such Precambrian-cored gneiss domes in New England. It is the only dome north of southern Connecticut that contains Late Proterozoic aged rocks (~604 Ma) that have characteristics suggesting that they were originally part of northern Africa. These rocks were sutured to North America as part of the Gander terrane during the Salinic Orogeny, approximately 420 million years ago. Most rocks of this age and origin are found in the eastern part of the state. The Pelham dome rocks are thought to have been underthrust beneath existing central Massachusetts rocks, and to now be visible by virtue of a 'window' through younger Paleozoic rocks that once covered them.

The Dry Hill Gneiss and the Poplar Mountain Gneiss on the Smith property and in immediately surrounding areas are interlayered, and detailed geologic mapping to document the precise location of outcrops of the two formations has not yet been done. The two are similar in appearance: the Dry Hill Gneiss consists of microcline gneiss, quartzites, and rare schists and amphibolites. It is pink to gray, medium- to coarse-grained. It is composed of quartz, microcline, oligoclase, biotite, +/- hornblende. Its most distinctive characteristic is megacrysts of pink microcline and white plagioclase. Several workers have suggested that the Dry Hill Gneiss was a felsic volcanic rock prior to metamorphism.

The Poplar Mountain Gneiss both overlies and underlies the Dry Hill Gneiss regionally due to folding, but it has been interpreted (Oxboel, 1998, UMass M.S. thesis) to be slightly younger than the Dry Hill Gneiss. It consists of a lower quartzite member and an upper gneiss member. The quartzites are gray to brown. The gneiss member consists mostly of light- to dark-gray gneiss consisting of quartz, microcline, oligoclase, and biotite, +/- muscovite. It hosts more mica than the Dry Hill Gneiss, allowing the two to be distinguished in the field. It also has a darker gray matrix, and white megacrysts of feldspar. The Poplar Mountain Gneiss may have originally been sedimentary rock that was derived from erosion and sedimentation of the underlying Dry Hill Gneiss.
